Screening of (Hope)lessness for peace

with

Daniel Friedmann, director

The secular cemetery of a kibbutz where Daniel looks for a tomb grows constantly to the point that he can’t find the grave anymore. With this sad observation, he travels the area over several years to interview without taboos philosophers, political men and residents of this region. To the rhythm of an innocent children song that hides a deep thought over the violence in universal history, he gives us each other’s feelings and analysis over the possible solutions to this endless conflict that is the most ancient in the world.

Daniel Friedmann is a sociologist and a film-maker. He was researcher at CNRS (National Center of Scientific Research) and is currently teaching at EHESS (High School of Social Sciences).
